A Century of Russian Song

THIS collection of fifty Russian songs, ranging from old-master Glinka well nigh a century ago to present-day composers like Glazunoff and Rachmaninoff, is the first comprehensive anthology of its kind outside Russia, and means the opening of an almost entirely new repertoire for the English and American concert-hall and drawing-room. The collector of these songs hopes that those who read these direct and sincere utterances of a great nation may derive from them a pleasure equalling the delight which he himself has experienced during the years spent in collecting and selecting them. He also ventures to hope that others will follow his initiative, inasmuch as these songs are indeed a key to the understanding of Russia's great symphonic music, so familiar to our concert audiences, and to everything that is national and based on folk-lore.

About my leading principle in the selection of the songs, I want to state, that I have not tried to find the most beautiful ones—a very vague definition, regarding which every man would decide differently—nor the ones that I personally like best (in fact, the limitation of space excluded some of the well-known and still beautiful Rubinstein and Tschaikowsky favorites, that are already available in separate editions);—but I chose those songs that seemed to bring the most characteristic message to the world, that are the most direct expression of the Russian national character.

Until about ten years ago Russian music had been identified chiefly with Tschaikowsky's music. Besides Glinka's operas, which were intermittently taken up in non-Russian opera houses, and Rubinstein's music, which arose and to a great extent vanished with the brilliant meteoric career of this virtuoso-genius, no Russian music came into prominence on the international market before Tschaikowsky; yet it was not the national element in him, not his operas and ballets, and early symphonies deeply rooted in racial feeling, that appealed to foreign nations, but it was the later Tschaikowsky, the polished, cosmopolitan, aristocratic musician, that captivated everywhere. Strongly perfumed, highly seasoned music, which dazzled and agitated the senses, appealed to the emotions, and seemed a particularly characteristic expression of our modern nervous times (before R. Strauss offset it, of course).

Symphonic conductors who were in touch and sympathy with Russian music persevered here and there in introducing works by Balakirew, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Glazunoff; some concert singers included in their repertoire romances by Cui, Borodine, Arensky;—yet it remained for the discriminating musicians and the sympathetic understanding of the public of Paris, in the past five years, to discover that Russia's greatest musician, the greatest musical individuality this Slavic nation has possessed, Modest Petrovitch Moussorgsky, had lived and died in misery some twenty-five years ago, unknown to the outer world, yet leaving a marvellous bequest to his nation and to the world,—compositions so strikingly new and original, that they seem to rank ahead of the most modern living composers, and which it would take generations thoroughly to absorb and appreciate. Claude Debussy and Alfred Bruneau have testified to his glory, Raoul Pugno has enlisted his noble enthusiasm in his cause, and a Russian admirer of his, Mme. Olénine d'Alheim, has given years of self-sacrificing effort to propagating Moussorgsky's music by lecture-recitals in France and Belgium and by books and pamphlets; with the result that nowadays scarcely a song-recital in Paris or London is given without some of Moussorgsky's music, and that New York is fast following on the trail. The lavish production of his opera "Boris Godounow" in Paris in 1908 by Serge de Diaghileff and Gabriel Astruc, with Th. Chaliapine in the title-rôle, has meant a complete victory for his genius, and most of the European opera houses have included this work of almost Shakespearian breadth and tragedy in their repertoires.

When Sergei Rachmaninoff toured America in 1909–10 as a pianist, this occasion was seized by a few singers to introduce his songs. He, of all living Russian composers, seemed the one most truly gifted in the domain of song. The spirit of the Russian landscape, its delicate fragrance, its vast and melancholy immensity, speak from the pages we have collected.

Glinka, the founder of Russian art-music, who with single-handed effort wakened the dormant elements of Russian folk-lore, elevating them to an artistic standard, and who at once established the national Russian school with all its characteristics of rhythm, harmony, and instrumentation, is represented by celebrated arias from his two best-known operas, music that is closely related to the contemporaneous German music of Weber and Marschner, but which nevertheless speaks its own idiom distinctly and forcibly.

Glinka's and Dargomijsky's ballads represent the period of romanticism in Russian music; they are elegiac, despairing, sentimental; they were written to move hearers to tears, and they did so unfailingly. Wonderful is the atmosphere of the Russian salons of 1840–50, that these ballads exhale: young men with romantic, lofty ideas; hypersensitive, schwärmerische ladies; desperate passions and infinite longing. All the milieu of Eugene Onegin, of which Pushkin and Tschaikowsky sang. — It is strange to see how the styles of Beethoven and Schubert become amalgamated with Russian melodic strains, and with what appealing results, as in Dargomijsky's Elegy (on a Moonlight-Sonata accompaniment), or in his "Prisoner in Siberia," who apostrophizes the "heavenly clouds" that are banished and homeless like himself.

Among the many songs of Rubinstein that would have been worthy to enter this collection, we felt it most important to call the attention of singers and public again to his "Persian Songs," those strange exotic blossoms, full of the sensuous charm and vivid imagination of the Arabian Nights, that he, being of oriental descent, was able to give posterity. These songs are so graceful and dainty, and so beautifully written for the voice, that the world is bound to take them up again.

Borodine, though born earlier than Tschaikowsky, Cui, and Balakirew, represents more fully the ultra-modern type of musical Russia. He was never a professional musician, and his music always breathes the spirit of aristocratic leisure, refined surroundings, and cultivated city life. Songs like the iridescent "Sea Queen," the strange-scented "Flowers of Love," the mysterious "Sleeping Princess," the short and poignant "Dissonance," show a marvellous sense for coloristic effects, which he produced by an harmonic scheme very similar to what is now called "Debussyism," but a method that he invented and practised long before Debussy.

In his "Song of the Dark Forest" Borodine has gone back to melodic and rhythmic traditions of early mediæval Russian music (as preserved in some of Russia's old weird folk-songs), the effect of a bard reciting a ballad being brought out with stirring and overpowering force.

Many songs of Cui and Balakirew might have been included, but their message did not seem so important or characteristic, nothing that the other composers had not better expressed or more strongly; so the former is represented only by the deliciously humorous "Poet and Critic" disguised as Cuckoo and Nightingale, the latter by his song "Oh, come to me," most popular in Russia, but little known elsewhere, a melody of such sweet charm, that no one having heard it can escape its haunting loveliness.

More than one-half of this book is devoted to the music of Moussorgsky, Tschaikowsky, and Rimsky-Korsakoff, fitly termed Russia's three greatest song-writers.

A Century of Russian Song

Of the younger generation that followed them, none has yet reached the heights attained by them. Arensky, well known by his piano-compositions, never rises beyond a certain salon-atmosphere in his songs. Glazunoff has given his best in symphonic compositions of rather characteristic tendencies. Their two songs here included, "Little Fish's Song" and "Nereid," are respectively characteristic in their limpid charm and graceful melodious contours.

Among Tchaikowsky's well-known songs, it was a question of selecting some hidden beauties that seem worthy of becoming universal property. How charming is the sketch called "Evening," that evokes the picture of Little-Russian hillsides so irresistibly, such a sweet, fragrant country picture, that is in music what Gogol's landscape-descriptions in his novels are to poetry. His weird oriental "Canary-Song" evokes the exotic splendors, the palms and mosques of the far-off east; and the simple folk-tune like "Legend," so poignant and appealing, more simple than Massenet's complicated "Legend of the Sagebrush;" and that setting of Tolstoy, "At the Ball," which has moved and will continue to move audiences to tears.

Rimsky-Korsakoff, the prolific opera-composer and gentle-hearted old wizard, who lived long enough to see his fame spread over the entire world, and who was feasted like a king of music when he came to Paris a year before his death (1908), was more fortunate than his comrade and bosom-friend Moussorgsky. These two composers made common cause in seeking and systematically gathering the treasures of Russian folk-song. But while Rimsky-Korsakoff shaped his music after the pattern of folk-song in a somewhat philistine, school-masterly way, Moussorgsky, who went into the subject heart and soul, was so imbued and identified with the national expression, that his songs seem almost the emanations of the entire race standing behind him.

Of Rimsky we give three early songs (1866-67), the "Southern Night," the weird "Hebrew Love-Song," and the melancholy "Georgian Hills," which are much in the same class as Borodine's songs; and three airs from his highly colored fairy opera "Snegourochka" (Little Snowflake), full of innocent charm and dainty rhythms.

I should have liked to give all Moussorgsky's work, but in the choice of eleven songs I hope to have shown him in his most characteristic aspect. Two cradle-songs of his are like two gems in this selection. Not being content with a rocking, lilted accompaniment and a sweet, floating melody, he draws the interior of a peasant's hut, the mother with infinite tenderness bending over her child, dreaming of its future; he makes us hear the mother's sigh, the infant's breathing, the ticking of the large clock; we feel the loneliness of it all. Marvellous pictures these two, of which the "Peasant Cradle-Song" must have been particularly dear to the composer, since he inscribed it to the memory of his mother. Here he finds for the angelic vision at the end harmonies of purple and gold, and draws melodies of mediæval Byzantine outlines.

Martha's song, from his last opera, "Khovanstchina," is an original folk-song, which he frames from verse to verse in a new and richer accompaniment. The "Divination by Water" from the same work is an extremely powerful composition, the opening "Invocation of the Spirits" being of almost ghastly and hypnotic effect. And now the vast loneliness, the desperate banishment of Siberia looms up from the throbbing of the downcast and muttered final phrases.

There is much sadness, much melancholy in Moussorgsky's music, as there is in all Russian poets and book-writers—Turgenieff, Dostojewsky, Tolstoy; just as any great art, being sincere, must mirror the true state of a nation. But in all art, I know of little that can be compared to Moussorgsky's "By the Water," from his song-cycle "Where no Sun Shines," in its mysterious fatality, its "Hamletian" meditation over the deepest riddle of life. It is not surprising that this composer, who in his music was wont to knock at the very gates of death, should have adopted the inspiration of his poet-friend Count Golenitshew-Koutouzow to write a cycle of Death-dances according to the conception of Holbein. Of these four song-paintings we present "Death and the Peasant" (Trepak), written on the weird rhythms of the Russian peasant-dance. Strange is the Epilogue to this song, which makes us realize the majestic indifference of nature to the misery of the individual. The poor peasant lies frozen under the snow, but the sun shines again, spring comes into the land, changing the rigid ice-fields to laughing rivulets and pools, and the merry lark soars to heavenly heights, singing its pæan of happiness.

A different peasant-dance is the "Hopak," which irresistibly draws us into its whirl, and makes us acquainted with a savage Russian sister of Carmen. "The Siege of Kazan," a ballad inserted in the opera "Boris Godounow," gives us a wild picture of mediæval Cossack-life, surely inspired by Gogol's master-novel, "Taras Bulba." The "Oriental Chant," which figures in his short Joshua-Cantata as a middle movement for solo contralto, is a strain that he caught from the lips of the Jewish peasant-people, most characteristic in its wailing and plaintive melody.

A Century of Russian Song

Not the least important among the wide and diverse fields of Moussorgsky's compositions are his nursery-songs, of which we quote that dainty little sketch called "Child's Song," comparing a child to a blossom, and "The Beetle," telling of a child who, playing in the garden, comes face to face with the problem of a beetle's death.

A fitting envoi to this collection is Rachmaninoff's setting of Tolstoy's "Billowy Harvest-field." May the golden grains of these Russian sheaves fall into fertile soil, and be reaped in a manifold harvest.

In order to facilitate the recital of these songs in English-speaking countries, especial care has been bestowed by Mr. Henry G. Chapman and others on the translations, which not only cover the poetical idea of the originals, but also closely follow the trend of the music. Fifty new songs, of undoubted value, should afford ample opportunity to promote the introduction of standard music in the English language. There is every reason that English-speaking countries should take up these songs in their own language instead of in exotic translations.

The first system of the musical score is for the first line of the song. It features a voice part and a piano accompaniment. The voice part is written on a single staff in a key of three flats (B-flat major or D-flat minor) and a 6/8 time signature. It begins with a whole rest, followed by a half note G4, a quarter note F4, a quarter note E4, a quarter note D4, a quarter note C4, and a quarter note B3. The piano accompaniment consists of two staves. The right hand starts with a half note G4, followed by a half note F4, and then a series of chords. The left hand starts with a half note G3, followed by a half note F3, and then a series of chords. The tempo is marked 'Andantino' and the dynamics are 'p' (piano).

Andante con moto e lamentoso (♩ = 96)

Modest Moussorgsky
(composed 1875-1881)

Voice

Piano

The musical score is written for voice and piano. The key signature is one sharp (F#) and the time signature is 6/4. The tempo is marked 'Andante con moto e lamentoso' with a metronome marking of quarter note = 96. The piano part begins with a pp (pianissimo) dynamic and later moves to p (piano). The voice part enters with the lyrics 'And by day and by night I fare' and 'Et de jour et de nuit je vais'. The piano accompaniment features a melodic line in the right hand and a more rhythmic, arpeggiated line in the left hand. The lyrics are in both English and French, with the French version in parentheses.

The first system of musical notation for the piano accompaniment. It features a treble and bass staff in G major (one sharp). The treble staff begins with a half rest followed by a quarter note G, then a half note A, and a quarter note B. This is followed by a triplet of eighth notes (C, D, E) and a half note F. The bass staff provides a harmonic accompaniment with chords and single notes. The tempo is marked 'Moderato' and the dynamic is 'mf espress.'.

The second system of musical notation. The treble staff continues the melody with a half note G, a quarter note A, and a half note B. This is followed by a triplet of eighth notes (C, D, E) and a half note F. The bass staff continues the harmonic accompaniment. The dynamic is marked 'dim.' (diminuendo).

The third system of musical notation. The treble staff continues the melody with a half note G, a quarter note A, and a half note B. This is followed by a triplet of eighth notes (C, D, E) and a half note F. The bass staff continues the harmonic accompaniment. The dynamic is marked 'p' (piano).
